Background

- Most Bollywood films in India have been primarily directed by male directors due to their patriarchal society.
- Women have been historically discriminated against in India and this has not changed till recently.
- Women characters in films are typically given the roles of a wife, mother, or a servant in films to help satisfy traditional expectations.
- As women start to direct more movies, the directors start to make subtle changes to female characters to help give them a distinct and stronger image that is different from traditional expectations.

Methods

- Researchers watched Bollywood films for the first time as intended by director and took count of how many male and female characters that talked during the film.
- After having the initial character count, researchers answered questions about the specific characters (caste system, behavior, trauma experienced, etc.) into a survey.
- Once surveys are completed, corrected for errors, and approved by the research mentor it is finally placed into a survey that compiles all the data that the researchers have done.

Data

Results

Preliminary results based on seven films completed include:

- Most women do not engage in taboo behavior, but our data show that it is more common with young adults and adults.
- The most common taboo behaviors were openly flirting and drinking.
- The most common trauma experienced among those groups are Psychological distress, Intimidation/Exploitation,, and Physical/Emotional Abuse by others.
- The most common gendered traits are Family oriented and generous.
- Gendered traits appeared more frequently when the character had lower education.

Conclusion

Although this research is still currently ongoing, the data we have collected tend to show that:

- Women directors are more likely to show young women in their films as showing off more taboo behavior.
- These female-directed movies also tend to show that female characters deviate from normal behavior in India.
- As noted with the results, female directors suggest that female characters that show taboo behaviors are more likely to experience trauma
- Data also suggests that female characters with higher education displayed less gendered traits.

Acknowledgement

We would like to thank Rebecca Peters for allowing us to join her research project and the other research assistants for their hardwork, guidance, and leadership.
